This is one of only a few books on oil pastel available, and unfortunately it is out of print. I haven't yet seen the other (by John Elliot), so I can't compare which is better. Leslie starts with an overview of oil pastels. He describes the qualities of the different brands (unfortunately Arc-en-Ciel brand doesn't seem to exist anymore, they look like they would have been fun). He also shows the results of an informal lightfastness test he conducted of the brands. Leslie covers color, markmaking, mixing oil pastel with other media, and general "image directions": still life, landscape, figure/portrait, invention, and abstraction. He describes several ways to make fine lines, and shows ways to fix mistakes. It has a great variety of information on techniques useful for an artist just starting to use oil pastels. You are not going to read this book and find you have a technique down pat, because like all other art media, there is no one correct technique. Finding what works for your own art is a matter of trying things. Leslie obviously knows what he is doing but I don't always like his art - I find it too purposefully childlike. However, there is a great variety of artwork illustrating this book, from realism to abstraction, showing quite a range of what can be done with the medium. One useful thing in this book is a recipe for making your own oil pastels - I can't find another anywhere. Since Leslie uses stand oil in his recipe (a drying oil), this might more accurately be called an oil stick recipe. I believe Leslie's information on the chemistry and permanence of the medium is outdated and/or incorrect. He claims that the oil in oil pastels is a mixture of siccative (drying) and nondrying oils.
